

Why is it important for human services workers to have a theoretical framework for helping and creating change in clients? Can't we just rely on "common sense", our experience and education in our diagnosing and treatment of clients? You might want to start your response by discussing what a theoretical framework is according to our text/readings.

It is important for human services workers to have a theoretical framework for helping and creating change in clients because they want to make a difference in a person's life. Human service workers go into this field because they want to help people and give people a change that they don't necessarily know they can do their selves. There is a misconception that everyone has the same common sense not to be stated as an insult but people come from different back grounds and think differently. In some cases some case workers think they were doing something good for their clients when all they were really doing was harming them. Relying on education and experience is not enough to diagnose or treat clients. This is why there are studies and research so that every possible answer and conclusion can be made. Dealing with people can be a very delicate field because you never know what you are going to get. Human services workers need to educate their selves and protect their selves when it comes to clients. It is important to stick to facts, and proven studies when handling a client so they can rely on the information and also use it.

Response 2

Theoretical framework focuses on the individual needs. This program focuses on understanding a persons background from culture, race, age, behaviors, and the way you were raised. Human service worker can help a client in many ways from school issues, hospice, hospital care, council, and mental or physical needs. Human service worker creates a plan to overcome your obstical and get the help and treatment needed.

Common since is a judgement baced on what you think is the best thing to do not on facts. Human service workers must stick to facts and follow there training about certain situations and not get personally involved. Human service job requires years of schooling and knowledge of what to do and how to handle each case as an individual. Each case has facts bace of where you come from and idea of how your life style is but to learn who someone is and what there needs are requires theoretical frame work to find out who you are the individual.
