Review this article about stolen cuneiform tablets that form a large portion of the collection that will be on display in the Museum of the Bible in Washington DC:

Hobby Lobby's Legal Expert Speaks: "I can't rule out...they used my advice to evade the law."

Green and his antiquities advisor Carroll took the advice of his expert Patty Gerstenblith to evade the law so that they can bring the collection to the United States and do not get charged

Do you think that museums should be allowed to display materials that can be clearly shown to have been stolen?

- Yes—because otherwise there would be almost nothing left in museums.
- Yes in the case of materials that have been in the museum for an extended period of time, perhaps twenty or fifty years.
- No—stolen materials should always be removed from display, and should be returned to their country of origin whenever possible.
- No—but only in cases where their original findspot is proven.
