

Discussion Question 1

- Due Date: Day 2 [Main forum]
- Review the sections on introductions and conclusions in the reading Drafting Your Research Paper on the aXcess page.
- Post your response to the following: What type of introduction and what type of conclusion do you plan to write for your research paper? How does the introduction draw readers into your argument, and how does the conclusion neatly tie up your paper? Explain your answers.

The introduction that I am more likely to use is maybe telling a story or writing as if my position will argue the other side of the topic. The reason I chose these two out of all of the choices was because these two seem to fit very well with the topic I chose. Telling a story about Drugs or Writing as if I will argue fits perfectly for an Introduction. I want to take a different approach in writing my paper something I haven't tried before and I haven't tried either of these Introduction ideas. For the conclusion I believe that I will either throw out a personal challenge or summarize the main points of the essay. These two conclusion types to me go along great with the Introduction choices I made. These two conclusion choices provide a strong message if done correctly and I think it would leave my audience wanting more information where learning sometime that may or may not have known. Throwing out a personal challenge will make my audience feel connected on a personal level to my writing. The introduction choices I made will draw readers into my argument by making them feel as there are going to hear a story or a different side of my argument. The conclusion will neatly tie up my paper by either giving my audience something personal to do within their homes or environments ,think about and analyze, or stress the main points in my paper while making sure that my audience understood the purpose behind my topic and the way I chose to write it.

Discussion Question 2

- Due Date: Day 4 [Main forum]
- Post your response to the following: In what ways are full-sentence outlines more beneficial than topic outlines? If someone asked, "Wouldn't it be simpler just to write your paper than to create a full-sentence outline?" how would you answer? Explain your response. What steps will you take to turn your outline into the body of your rough draft?

Re: Week 6: DQ 2 - Day 4

Posted: Thu 06/25/2009 05:27 PM , by: Andrea Taylor (qdp21@email.phoenix.edu)

Previous | Next

- Red(High)
- Yellow(Medium)
- Blue(Low)
- No Flag

- Reply
- View/Print
- Remove
- Flag Message
- Mark as unread

Full sentence outlines are more detailed than topic outlines. Full sentence outlines are more beneficial than topic outlines because they help you sentence by sentence instead of topic and then the sub topics. It breaks down a possible paragraphs by the sentences,full- sentence outline, versus topic outlines which will help with the start of paragraphs for each section of your paper. It would be useful to use the full sentence outline rather than just write my paper because the sentence outline helps you maintain and keep structure of your paragraphs and enables you to catch mistakes a lot quicker because you are taking a little more time in creating the right words for your paper as a whole but sentence by sentence. It's simple the steps that I will take in turning my outline into the body of my rough draft are easy as following the order in which I wrote the information in sentence form.