

Kierra Quinn

HD 101

Robby Cooper

2/20/16

Journal Reflection #1

My child so far has had somewhat of an unsuccessful navigation of Erikson's first life stage. My child has mistrust for her surroundings and other people unless I am somewhere near her she acts uncomfortable and she also is cautious and doesn't want to explore any further unless I am there with her and even then it takes a while for her to warm up. For example, in the doctors office when her and I were separated the doctor said that she was a bit fussy and very cautious and shy to her surroundings and new people, he also said that after her vaccination she took a while to calm down and this may be because she was mistrusting of the situation. When I am present though, she is more trusting of the environment and more willing to explore. One significant event to this life stage that my child has done is that she is feeding well.

Works Cited

Feldman, Robert S. Lifespan Development: A Topical Approach. Harlow: Pearson Education, 2010. Print.